Students in Joint PhD programs are expected to complete pedagogical training requirements for both programs. As with other requirements, overlapping requirements need to be met only once, but because of the unique nature of pedagogical training in some programs, what constitutes “overlapping” requirements requires discussion between the two programs. Here follows the agreed upon standard training plan for the established joint PhD program in Cinema & Media Studies and East Asian Languages an Civilizations.

Broadly speaking, CMS expects students to complete one graduate student-TAship in year 3, two graduate student-TAships in year 4, and one graduate student lectureship in each of years 4 and 5. They also require students to complete courses in pedagogical training. EALC expects students to complete three graduate student-TAships (usually over years 3 and 4), and one graduate student lectureship (usually in year 6). They encourage, but do not require, students to complete courses in pedagogical training.

For students in the standing joint PhD program in Cinema & Media Studies and East Asian Languages & Civilizations, the following has been devised as the general approach for pedagogical training:

Students in the joint PhD program will be expected to complete three graduate student-TAships and two graduate student lectureships. The TAships positions may be for courses in either department, and the two graduate student lectureships should be split between the two departments. They are also required to complete pedagogical training courses as prescribed by CMS.

For students in the joint PhD program who also wish to obtain the EALC training in second-language pedagogy, their EALC stand-alone language course will fill the role of the required lectureship for EALC.

Exceptions:

- If students in the joint PhD program go abroad for research or language study in years 4 or 5, they are exempted from one of the graduate student lectureship requirements, and will typically complete just one lectureship in year 6. In these cases the lectureship will ordinarily be for a course in the home department.

- If students in the joint PhD program hold a fellowship in year 6 that precludes teaching during that year (e.g., a Neubauer admission fellowship or a DCF), they are also exempted from one of the graduate student lectureship requirements.

Other exceptions may also be possible due to particular circumstances. Students may meet with the DGS in both departments if they believe that an alternate plan will accomplish the pedagogical training goals. Any alternate plan must be approved by both departments.
